In the article, from the standpoint of philosophy of constructivism and cultural-historical psychology, the process of reconstructing a historical picture of the past is considered. History of psychology in this context is regarded as a part of historical psychology. Within the framework of the cultural-historical theory, interpreter's active participation in the construction of a model of the past, the derivativeness of a model he creates from implicit goals of an investigation, driving motives, a categorical structure of a researcher's language are justified. In addition to the conceptual reflection of an object of research, the possibility of empathy, identification with people of a particular era is supposed.
